

Jan Vybíral

Charles University Prague, Czech Republic

From approximation theory to machine learning

We discuss similarities and differences between approximation theory and data analysis. We introduce basic concepts from these fields, stressing their common points, their limits, and the ways they interact with each other. After presenting the basic ideas on classical problems like ridge regression, lasso, and compressed sensing, we investigate in detail the resemblance of neural networks and the approximation theoretical problem of recovering the sum of ridge functions.